

What a living will is

A living Will is a document in which you tell others of your wishes to be allowed to die a natural death – if you should become unable to express your wishes in the future. The living will tells medical professionals and members of your family to what extent special means should or should not be used to keep your body alive if you are incurably ill. The living will allows you to refuse certain medical procedures that may only prolong dying, or maintain the body in an unconscious state. The living will is to be used only if you become terminally ill or permanently unconscious.

Should I have a living will?

It is not necessary that you be seriously ill or anticipating illness in order to benefit from a living will. In fact, a living will can help protect your family members from unnecessary emotional stress resulting from having to make important decisions in an unexpected crisis. A living will enables you to control the extent to which extraordinary measures will be used to prolong your life, and it relieves others from the responsibility of having to make such decisions.

What types of treatment are affected?

Your living will affects only those types of treatments which, in the opinion of your doctor, would only serve to postpone the moment of death by artificially altering your body's vital functions. Some examples include:

- Artificial Feeding: If a patient is no longer able to swallow food, nourishment may be supplied through tubes inserted in the nose or incision in the abdomen.

- Artificial Ventilation: Machines which assist or control your breathing are called ventilators. Some patients are totally dependent on ventilators and would die without their support. A living will can address the question of continuing such support when there is no prospect of improvement.

- Cardiopulmonary Resuscitation (CPR): When the heart stops (cardiac arrest), a special measure called cardiac resuscitation may be used to try to restart the heart. CPR includes the use of chest compressions, intravenous medicines, and electrical shock. Your living will may direct that any or all of these not be used.

Does this mean giving up or stopping care?

A living will affects only measures which are deemed to be useless. Making a living will does not mean that you will be abandoned. Doctors and nurses will continue attending to your needs, and every effort will be made to keep you comfortable.

What is a healthcare proxy?

A healthcare proxy is an individual you choose to make healthcare decisions for you. A proxy can be named on the attached form.

What to do with your living will

It is important that your doctor and family members know about your living will and have a copy of it. Take a copy with you to the hospital. It is important that your doctor and family members know in advance about your living will or healthcare proxy. Keep your original.

If you change your mind

Your living will or healthcare proxy can be revoked at any time by telling your doctor or family members that your wishes have changed. All copies of a living will or healthcare proxy to be revoked also should be destroyed.

Can one person make a living will for another?

If the patient is a child or an adult who can no longer make medical decisions, a close family member or guardian can make a living will for the patient.

Help is available

Your living will involves some of life's most important choices and ethical considerations. Such choices are not always easy, but help is available. You may wish to ask our doctor to discuss these questions with you, or refer you to others who are qualified to help. Discussing these considerations with family members may serve to clarify questions you may have.
